<td>Description</td>
<td>We need to give affected communities a voice in order to shed light on their crucial role in the conception, design and implementation of local, tailor-made TB care. In the post-2015 era, the fight against TB cannot be business as usual: it is as much a social as a medical struggle and requires engagement on the ground if tangible success is to be recorded. A precondition for this is a robust TB community movement that is fully recognised and has its strengths harnessed by all partners. This will allow them to effectively deal with the challenges currently confronting affected communities.</td>
